"Post Apocalyptic Blues" is a light hearted romp, it's a rootsy country folk dancey vibe exploring a kind of "It's the end of the world as we know it" theme, "I guess, if i had to pigeon hole it, I might have been thinking a little Mississippi John Hurt and The Kinks and possibly contemplating a big New Orleans trombone part possibly."

"The lyrics originally sprang out of lamenting the closing of our favorite diner near our house. It was a downer when they shut that place down and the song was originally a kind of a "there goes the neighborhood" sort of lament taken to the nth degree. I mean, they just shut down our favorite diner but I thought a tongue and cheek song equating it to "an apocalypse" would be a funny sort of way to approach a song. Fast forward to 2020 and here we are living through a global pandemic and truly living through something fairly apocalyptic that none of us could have foreseen. The lyrics have an odd kind of resonance given what we are living through currently so we thought it might be timely to make a comical video to hopefully lift some spirits during this otherwise very serious and sad time." -- Chris Isom, NOCONA
