"Tabernacle Woes was conceived as basically a stream of consciousness fever dream about global tribal divisions and a search for some form of enlightenment or perspective, it was written in one sitting with very little change from the initial pass. The mantra, "Fear a god, don't fear the gun as it lays you low. Fear a god, don't feel the gun as it lays you low. " represents an existential paradox about existing in a tribal group. What god? What gun? What war? Does a god really ever stop the bullets from coming? "I won't know anyone ever in their green, and your gadfly is dead in the moon." All bets are off in the modern world, all predictions of the future are off, no one knows the future and we never know anyone until we are able to cast off our tribal divisions and see clearly how we are all humans sharing the same space." -- Chris Isom
